English countryside is a trip back in time

HEXHAM, England — A bone-chilling rain swept over the moors on the October day we hiked to the top of the ruins of Hadrian's Wall, a few miles south of the Scottish border.

Gusts of wind, scouring the tumble-down ruins of the second century Roman barracks built on the summit drove most sensible people indoors. But the dark clouds and lowering sky, pelting the armory, shrine and sleeping quarters with rain, set the mood as nothing else could have done. Shivering in my summer-weight parka — a last-minute purchase — I realized how tedious a tour of duty on these barren earthworks must have been.

Our guide, Brian Posner, a history buff at the site now known as Housestead's Fort, agreed. "After a long day in these comfortable double-soled hiking boots, I can't help admiring the soldiers who marched for miles in flimsy sandals and defended the wall in all kinds of weather." A retired doctor, Posner shook his head, imagining it.

"They were a long way from home, but they did have their comforts," he added as we sipped hot cocoa in the visitors center. "The Romans garrisoned here had not only a hospital and an indoor latrine, but a bathhouse with hot-water tubs and heated stone floors."

With the 2012 Summer Olympics set for London this July, heritage sites throughout England are bracing for record crowds. Back in the day, it was the rare traveler who ventured this far from London, north to the Lake District, past the Peaks District and on to the rugged hills where the remains of the 73-mile-long wall, built in 123 AD., stretches from coast to coast.

But in recent years, the region's cultural and economic growth has made it a player, shifting industries, jobs and tourism northward. Along with a handful of other historic but out-of-the-way destinations, Hadrian's Wall is a popular UNESCO World Heritage Site. And you won't have to tramp for miles to see it, as the Roman legions did. With visitors centers, guides, exhibits and facilities built at intervals, you can spend an hour or two here, or all day hiking along the northern-most frontier.

Skipping London altogether, we flew nonstop to Manchester's modern International Airport and rented a car, heading north to a hotel in Hexham, near the wall. Auto travel on the area's two-lane roads used to take forever. Not anymore. You can drive from Manchester to York in two to three hours on a fast, multilane freeway, with exits at any town you might want to visit.

In minutes we were off and wandering along quiet country roads, feeling like horse-and-carriage passengers in a 19th century period film. Our typical day might start with a castle visit and a cathedral tour, followed by a side-of-the-road trailhead and a path to a trout stream. Or it might include a sightseeing drive between farms divided by stone walls, views of heather-covered moors and hillside sheep pastures. Each noon we'd break for a pub lunch of shepherd's pie, fish and chips or a quiche, with a pint of beer on tap. By late afternoon we were ready for a hot soak in our hotel room, a good meal and a warm bed.

These were our A-list entries:

One: Durham, home of Durham Castle and Cathedral, also a World Heritage Site. The Castle, a medieval fortress built by William the Conqueror in 1072, is still the heart of Durham University and more surprising, a student residence. "Imagine yourself as a new student here, trying to fall asleep amongst a thousand years of stone walls and gloomy ghosts," said Karen, our guide.

The cathedral, built between 1080 and 1280 to house St. Cuthbert's coffin, shamelessly mixes intricately painted and colored columns with geometric designs and flamboyant carvings, mostly likely a visual treat for parishioners then, and for tourists now.

Two: Hadrian's Wall. Enough said.

Three: Carlisle's stone-cold fortified castle, where Mary Queen of Scots was imprisoned. Chilly and impregnable.

Four: A ride on the Carlisle-to-Settle Railway, running south through the Yorkshire Dales. A famously scenic trip, it crosses the North Pennine hills offering close-ups of every lumpy fell (hill) and dell (valley), sparsely dotted by tiny villages and shot-through by limestone caves.

Five: Two nights at the Devonshire Arms, a deluxe country hotel and former coaching inn in the Yorkshire Dales National Park. With the inn as base camp, we drove hither and yon over the Dales, lingering to photograph canal boats passing through a set of locks and hiking to Malham Cove, a meadowy-green, glacier-gouged valley at the head of a vertical cliff.

Six: Taking the mark of the ancient city of York and of its soaring Gothic church, the York Minster. Driving east, we reached York by late afternoon and checked into the Dean Court hotel inside the medieval walls. The inner city, divided by narrow lanes, took us back a thousand years. It's also abustle with time-tested tourist enterprises: restaurants, gift shops and souvenirs stores selling T-shirts, tea towels and tea cozies.

But I won't forget waking up to the sun sliding down the cathedral's lacy towers and to hear the bells toll vespers. We were there in time to hear the choir sing evensong and fortunate to find seats beside them, in the stalls. Tour guide Wendy Brooks said that the thousands of stones in this massive pile aren't held together by conventional mortar but simply by gravity. Each layer of rock holds the layer below in place, with nothing between them but a soupy coat of pulverized stone to fill the gaps. I still can't believe it.

York's most popular tour is the "Jorvik" experience, a Disney-style, kid-friendly theme park channeling the first Viking settlement. The 45-minute narrated ride takes time travelers (that's you) back to 975 A.D. to reveal dimly lit scenes of gritty Viking life, followed by a self-guided walk through a Viking village peopled by costumed docents.

Simon Watt, 27, aka "Omagh the rafen," was sitting so still at his work bench we thought he was a mannequin. "It means I'm a coin striker," he said smiling. "This coin is a penniga, a Viking penny. If I cut it into quarters, each will be a fourth of a thing, or a farthing," he explained. Well, well, another bit of lore.

"A week isn't enough," said Liz Clayton at the Devonshire Arms. "You'll miss more than you've seen. But like any good appetizer, it leaves you hungry for more. When you're ready, we'll be here."

If you go ...

The Devonshire Arms Country Inn & Spa, at

Bolton Abbey, is near Skipton in the Yorkshire Dales. Now a five-star luxury retreat, it belongs to the Duke of Devonshire's farm estates. Dining on fine cuisine with attentive service in the award-winning restaurant is a treat for royalty. Miles of walking paths surround the inn. Prices per person, per night, for two sharing a room midweek, start at $436 and include full breakfast and VAT tax. Parking is free. See www.thedevonshirearms.co.uk.

The Dean Court Hotel in York, across from the York Minster, is a boutique hotel in a historic brick building. Prices per double room for two start at $224 and include full breakfast. Hotel parking is $13 per day. The Dean Court belongs to England's Best Western luxury group. See www.deancourt-york.co.uk.
