Serenity is a breeze in the West Indies

Expect mangoes to fall at your feet, not party animals, when you visit tranquil Nevis

NEVIS, West Indies — Want a sweet getaway this winter in a warm Caribbean clime?

Stay on a historic sugar cane plantation on the Old West Indies island of Nevis.

Once called Dulcina (Sweet Island) and known as the Queen of the Caribbees, Nevis (pronounced knee-vis) is a civilized place that stands apart from other tourist destinations with their typical high-rise hotels pulsing with party animals.

Nevis is breezy and beachy, tropical and tranquil, and offers a classic colonial Caribbean experience.

A sister island to nearby St. Kitts, Nevis covers just 36 square miles. The landscape is lush and tropical, and monkeys outnumber people, so you won't find crowds, college kids and T-shirt shops. Instead, boutique lodgings and luxury properties are set on the sites of old plantations that produced sugar, lime and coconut.

Sure, Nevis has open-air beach bars with reggae music and dancing under the stars, and it practically rains rum punch there year-round. But mostly it's a quiet place, where sea turtles nest and lay eggs in the moonlight, and the past and the present bump elbows along ancient mountain trails leading back down to the sea.

HOLIDAYS

Christmas is an art in Germany

Traditional yuletide markets filled with holiday wonder

By ANNE Z. COOKE

DRESDEN, Germany — The holidays came early last year, no thanks to old Saint Nick.

With visions of twinkling lights and sugarplums dancing in my head, I left California in early December and headed for Christmas markets in three of Germany's most historic cities: Dresden, Berlin and Weimar.

I found myself in a wonderland, enchanted by falling snowflakes and discovering that what they say is true: When it comes to celebrating Christmas the old-fashioned way, nobody does it like Germany.

So what are Christmas markets?

They look like farmers markets, with outdoor stalls in rows and each vendor selling his own merchandise. They offer an assortment of cakes and cookies, chocolates, cheeses, ornaments and more.

Usually, you'll find them in the middle of the town's oldest square, fabulously decorated and busiest from 4 p.m. to midnight.

When twilight settles over Germany's cobblestone streets, tiny lights twinkle, and holiday revelers, swaddled in thick coats, gather to stroll, gawk, shop and meet their friends for an evening of merriment.

In Dresden, that meant a lively atmosphere, and afterward, concert tickets purchased at the door of Dresden's restored Frauenkirche. Here, too, was my chance to visit Germany's oldest and most traditional Christmas market, the Striezelmarkt, founded in 1434 and celebrating its 579th anniversary.

Plan now for German Christmas markets

Snow? No problem

In Weimar, where a heavy snowfall turned the town's dollhouse-size Market Square classic white, the smell of bratwurst and sounds of carols created a different atmosphere.

Not only were visitors wandering among the stalls shopping for gifts, but residents were there, too, undeterred by the snow. Parents pushed strollers or pulled children on sleds. Couples pored over carved wooden figures and hand-knit sweaters.

Later I toured the home of Goethe, who was not only a poet and dramatist but a politician, amateur scientist and economic adviser to his royal patron.

In Berlin, where the blaze of lights from the bustling Alexanderplatz Christmas Market were visible from my hotel window, the impulse to walk over after dinner, even after a day of sightseeing, was impossible to resist.

As the biggest and busiest of Berlin's four holiday markets, it was the perfect place to sample a cup of the season's traditional mulled wine (gluhwein) before bed.

I didn't buy much. Carry-on suitcases impose unwelcome limits. But that didn't lessen the pleasure of wandering from stall to stall, each one piled high with the most amazing crafts: wooden toys, carved winter scenes, blown-glass birds with fluttery tails, glass icicles, sparkly stars, scented candles, gilded angels, knitted scarves, leather handbags, tiny painted dolls with round heads, nutcrackers, bird houses and Christmas pyramids, their topmost windmill blades revolving slowly, turned by candle power.

Food was there as well: fresh-baked cakes, fruity stollen loaves, frosted cookies, gingerbread, sausages and dozens of cheese varieties.

Despite freezing temperatures, mothers in thick coats pushing carriages were as common as bakers with their loaves.

And all around came fragments of conversation, the world's languages in one place.

Russians, Turks, Italians and Brits walked past, shopping bags stuffed full. A French family stopped to outfit their children with woolen mittens. A Spanish visitor who thought I was German asked me for directions. Plenty of Americans took in the scenes, too.

Longer season

In recent years, some Christmas markets have extended the season, from late November to New Year's. The motivation is, of course, profit.

I spotted some stalls selling T-shirts, jeans, wallets and backpacks at the Alexanderplatz Market, and a Mickey Mouse kids' ride in Dresden.

But the butchers, the bakers and the toy makers are still front and center, ensuring that twinkling lights will be there for next year.

Snow falls on Weimar's Christmas market in Germany, but it won't deter hardy vendors or shoppers.

When you go

Two smart moves I made and can recommend to friends: Fly nonstop and buy a German rail pass for intracity travel.

WHERE TO STAY: In Berlin, the contemporary Hotel Indigo Berlin is a block from the Alexanderplatz Market; hotelindigoberlin.com. In Dresden, the stylish Swisshotel am Schloss is one block from the Frauenkirche; swisshotel.com/Dresden. In Weimar, the resort-style Dorint Am Goethepark is a 10-minute walk from Market Square, a favorite with tour groups and a five-star choice for lavish buffet breakfasts; dorint.com/en/hotel-weimar.
