

looking back at the photos, we remember it all. There was the glacier-viewing cruise through Prince William Sound, to see giant slabs of ice calving into the sea and to learn about glacial action. And the flightseeing tour over the vast Harding loefield, mother of most of the area glaciers. We hiked to Exit Glacier, looking for brown bears and eagles. We didn't try kayaking or windsurfing, but we watched other intrepid sportsmen breasting the whitecaps in Resurrection Bay. And we took the wildlife sightseeing cruise to the far end of the bay, stopping at Fox Island for a salmon bake, lingering in front of Bear Glacier, a huge tidewater glacier, and idling beside sea lion and puffin colonies. Later we saw more sea lions and puffins but a close range, in the rescue wing of the extraordinary Alaska SeaLife Center, the aquarium and wildlife rescue center in Seward.

We ate, shopped and explored Seward, the gateway to Alaska in the pre-railroad era, where recent excavations have revealed ancient aboriginal village sites. We took a guided float trip on the Kenai River, spotting a couple of moose and learning about other pre-European village sites nearby.

We spent a night in Homer, a budding artists' colony on the southwest tip of the peninsula, driving the length of the thin strip of sand known as the Homer Spit and strolling along the boardwalk past bars, cafes, shops and boat slips.

TODAY'S DEAL

We got a brief look at early Russian history, still alive at the miniscule Russian orthodox churches in the villages of Kenai and Ninilchik. We stopped at North Beach, near Kenai, to watch hopeful fishermen wielding huge, round dip nets. It sounded so easy when a friend described it, but holding one of those metal nets in the breakers was darn hard. And we ate fresh fish at every meal, from grilled salmon and king crab to the kids' first choice, fish and chips. They liked cod better than halibut: go figure.

So that was Rule 1. Here's Rule 2.

If you want to fish the Kenai River, book a cabin for a couple of nights with Bill White or Joe Connors, two good ol' boys who share prime Kenai River frontage near Sterling. Real-time sourdoughs, they've got cabins, docks you can fish from any time of day, and rods and reels to borrow. In the middle is a campfire ring where other good ol' boys (guests from elsewhere) sit around with a beer in hand, reliving the day's fishing.

Joe, a licensed guide and owner of Big Sky Charter & FishCamp, shows newcomers how to catch sockeye (unique to this river), sells fishing licenses and books half and full-day guided motorboat fishing. His guides will clean and filet your salmon, and truck it to the fast-freeze plant in Sterling.

A former University of Alaska professor and member of the Kenai River Sportfishing Association, Joe is also founder of the Alaska Fisheries Conservation Alliance, AFCC, a group dedicated to minimizing the damage that 20-foot-tall set nets, used by commercial fisheries, inflict on the annual king salmon runs. The sockeye are a legitimate catch. But the nets, anchored parallel to the shore, also trap king salmon. With many fewer kings reaching their spawning grounds - and the numbers are down - future generations of kings are endangered, as is today's sport fishing.

Bill White and his wife, and Bill Jr., who run their place as the Alaska Sports Lodge, helped us settle into our cabin and loaned us rods, reels and knee-high rubber boots. The cabins offer basic shelter and an efficiency kitchen - remember, fishermen are not there for the decor - and a sofa, chairs, breakfast table, beds and bunks downstairs and in the loft. Our cabin slept six, and had a delightful front deck with deck chairs and a gas grill. It looked bare when we arrived. It felt like home when we left.

With our photo count at 2,351 and a notebook crammed with details, we spent our last long day driving back to Anchorage, and to the airport for a night flight home. As we whizzed past now-familiar names and places, I can't tell you how many times I heard a voice from the back seat say, "Next time, I want to stay here longer."

I hope they will.

IF YOU GO:

Visit Anchorage at www.anchorage.net, or call (907)257-2363.

See the Kenai Peninsula: www.kenaipeninsula.org.

For the Alaska SeaLife Center, see www.sealifecenter.org.

The Seward Windsong lodge at www.sewardwindsong.com.

For Bill White's cabins, see www.alaskasportslodge.com.

For Joe Connors' cabins and guides: www.kenaiguide.com.

For Kenai River float trips: see www.AlaskaRiverAdventures.com.

Order a reprint of this story

JOIN THE CONVERSATION

News & Observer is pleased to provide this opportunity to share information, experiences and observations about what's in the news. Some of the comments may be reprinted elsewhere in the site or in the newspaper. We encourage lively, open debate on the issues of the day, and ask that you refrain from profanity, hate speech, personal comments and remarks that are off point. Thank you for taking the time to offer your thoughts.

Commenting FAQs | Terms of Service

Record rain floods Triangle roads; storms knock out power

Cleveland High School football player learns that verbal scholarship 'offers' aren't always offers

Ineligible at North Carolina, P.J. Hairston found an alternate way to get better

NC legislature adopts new rules on protests

Duke's Mike Krzyzewski takes 40 percent pay cut, still makes $6 million

Real Deals: Texas developer unveils $90 million retail, residential project at Crabtree Valley